ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am deeply indebted to Professor Cephas Omenyo, Department of Theology, University of Ghana, Legon and Professor Abraham van de Beek, Faculty of Theology, VU University Amsterdam, and to my two supervisors Professor Martien Brinkman, Head of the International Reformed Theological Institute at the faculty of Theology, VU University Amsterdam and Professor Mechteld Jansen, Protestant Theological University Utrecht, The Netherlands,

I owe a debt of gratitude to Prof. Omenyo who has been involved in this research from its inception. Rev. Prof. Omenyo nominated me for the IRTI program in 2003. He also willingly offered to serve as my co-promoter in Ghana. His candid advice to use a different approach in my survey of congregation members has been of immense help. He also took time to read parts of my work and made very helpful suggestions.

Thanks to Prof. Abraham van de Beek (former head of the IRTI program at the faculty of theology of the VU University, Amsterdam) who has also been involved in this research from the very beginning. Professor van de Beek encouraged me to write my Master’s dissertation on ‘Developing a Theology and a Culture that Foster Development for African Women’ and to build on it for a PhD. I indebt him a lot of gratitude. In addition, Prof van de Beek helped in getting me a laptop for free, without which this study would have been very difficult.

I register my deep sense of appreciation to Prof. Martien Brinkman who willingly accepted to have me as his promovendus. His candid suggestions have been extremely helpful. He never imposed his views on me rather he respected my views and trusted me to work independently under his kind guidance. Professor Brinkman saw the need for me to travel to Amsterdam to meet my supervisors and he made the necessary arrangements for me to travel. That visit to Amsterdam in 2010 proved to be extremely helpful in finalizing this research. He assiduously read through the work during his sabbatical months and co-operates to bring this research this far.
I record also my gratitude to Prof. Mechteld Jansen who has also been involved in this research from its inception. Prof Jansen served as one of my supervisors for my Master’s dissertation on the IRTI program at the VU University Amsterdam. Professor Jansen showed keen interest in my subject from the very beginning. She stimulated, inspired and encouraged me whenever I got discouraged. At a time when I wanted to give up the research, she sent me an e-mail informing me that there are many good things in the research and urged me not to give up. It seems like she had read my mind and her words actually motivated me to finish the work. Professor Jansen also took it upon herself to read through my draft and made very insightful suggestions. Her deep understanding of Women and Church issues as well as Social Studies and research methods has significantly informed this study.

Thanks also go to Rev. Isaac Amoah and his wife who were at my rescue at various times when I needed help. Repeatedly, he and his wife picked me from Schiphol Airport (usually at 6 a.m.) and hosted me at their lovely home, and offered wonderful hospitality. Their friendly and generosity has been immense and unprecedented. I record also my gratitude to Mr. and Mrs. Amankwah of the Methodist Church in Amsterdam who had me in their home on occasions when I had to be their guest.

My research assistants with whom I worked contributed immensely to this book by making hard data accessible to me from the field. I am heavily indebted to them. I am also grateful to all who responded to questionnaires and granted interviews. They provided valuable information that has enriched this research.

Special thanks go to IRTI, the body responsible for the program and the faculty of theology of the VU University Amsterdam that granted me the scholarships for both the master’s and doctoral programs.

It is customary in Acknowledgements to acknowledge one’s indebtedness to one’s spouse. In this case, I do so with full gladness. Throughout the whole research period I enjoyed John’s constant encouragement comfort and understanding; something that is very rare among Akan and by extension African men. I must say how proud I am of my husband John who always understood my inability to be with him all the time and cared very little about what goes on around me and when I often neglected a few domestic responsibilities. He has provided an unfailing love, comfort, support and encouragement in difficult times whenever despair wanted to creep into my efforts.
